Would you like to be your own boss?

Entrepreneurs, freelancers, and self-employed people work for themselves, providing either a product or a service for sale. They own or run their own business, and this can vary from providing services such as dog-walking plastering or hairdressing

to a company set up to produce and market a new piece of technology.

Starting a business and making it a success is hard work. You need to do extensive research and think about the following questions:

- Do people need my product or service?
- How do I make my product or deliver my service?
- How much money will I need to start, and how will I get it?
- Will I need to employ staff? How much will this cost?
- How will I market and promote my product?
- How will I sell my product, in a shop, online or somewhere else?
- Where will I operate my business?
- What transport costs will I have to pay?

What is an entrepreneur?

An entrepreneur is a person who starts a business based on an original idea for a product or service that is not yet available in their market.

Many entrepreneurs set up their companies on their own, and have to find support like funding from investors or suppliers for the materials they need.

Entrepreneurs tend to start with limited resources, and have to be prepared to take risks.

Many entrepreneurs support themselves with other sources of income while they're starting their business, so that they can take the time to build up a customer base and make a profit.

What does it mean to be self-employed?

Self-employed people own a business that offers a product or service that benefits its customers.

Typically, business owners have a thorough understanding of their industry and already know who their target customers will be.

Unlike entrepreneurs, the business is often the owners' only source of income, so their main responsibility is to make it a success in order to support themselves and any staff they employ. Business owners are, therefore, less likely to be able to take big risks.
